How North Carolina Wrongful Death Claims Differ from Personal Injury Claims

A personal injury claim is typically filed by the person who has suffered an injury and against another party who is believed to have caused that injury. The only exception would be where the person who was injured was under the age of 18 or otherwise subject to a guardianship.

Wrongful death claims are primarily different from personal injury claims in that they are brought by someone other than the person who suffered the injury that resulted in death. Under North Carolina law, the personal representative of the deceased's estate can pursue the claim. The personal representative is typically named in the will, but if there is no will or other estate plan, a personal representative may be appointed by the court. Typically, the personal representative is a surviving parent, spouse, or adult child of the deceased. Working with a Raleigh wrongful death attorney is often necessary simply because of the legal issues involved with the estate, even if the estate is otherwise uncomplicated.

Another way that wrongful death claims differ from personal injury claims is in what kind of compensation may be sought. Personal injury claims seek compensation for only those losses suffered by the person injured, like medical expenses, lost income, and pain and suffering. Wrongful death claims, on the other hand, can seek compensation for those same losses as well as the following:

- Funeral and burial expenses
- The value of support and services the deceased provided to their family
- The value of lost guidance and nurturing to the surviving children
- The value of lost companionship for the surviving spouse or parents
- The expected lost income from the deceased's wages, investments, and other benefits

When a family loses a loved one, there are typically life-long consequences for the surviving family members. A Raleigh wrongful death attorney can make sure that your family gets the compensation you deserve.

Wrongful Death Claims Following a Crime

Most wrongful death claims are the result of negligence, such as car accidents, medical malpractice, or slip and fall accidents. In these cases, you are asserting that the other party's negligence resulted in death and they should therefore be held liable for the losses that they caused. As a result, you will need to prove that the other party's negligence was a breach of their duty of due care and that it resulted in death. In many ways, this is very similar to what you would have to prove in a typical personal injury claim.

However, wrongful death claims can also arise following a crime. For example, many wrongful death cases can arise from an intentional tort such as an assault that resulted in death. While the other party may be facing criminal charges, a wrongful death claim allows the surviving family members to seek compensation for the losses caused by the defendant's actions.

It is also important to note that your wrongful death claim exists independently of what happens with the criminal charges. Even if the criminal charges are dismissed or the defendant is acquitted, you may still be able to successfully pursue a wrongful death claim. This is because wrongful death claims are judged according to a lower standard of proof than in a criminal case. In addition, the defendant may be innocent of committing a crime, but may still have been negligent. For example, extreme carelessness that resulted someone's death.

If you are considering pursuing a wrongful death claim following a crime, timing can be a factor. For example, a guilty verdict may help you prove your claim. A Raleigh wrongful death attorney can provide you with the guidance you need as to when and how to pursue your case.

Other Situations Managed by a Raleigh Wrongful Death Lawyer

In general, you can pursue a wrongful death action any time another party's actions, intentional or unintentional, result in the death of a loved one. This includes the following:

- Deaths caused by defective products. Strictly speaking, you do not need to prove negligence in a defective products case. Instead, you simply need to prove that the product was unreasonably dangerous when used as intended and it resulted in death.
- Class action lawsuits. Class action lawsuits are claims brought on behalf of several, sometimes thousands, of people. Depending on the nature of the case, class action lawsuits often include claims for wrongful death.
- Industrial and construction site accidents that result in death.
- Deaths caused by mesothelioma, lung cancer, or asbestos exposure.

If you have lost a loved one due to the actions of another person, corporation, or other organization, you may be entitled to compensation. A Raleigh wrongful death attorney can discuss your case and help you understand your options.

Wrongful Death Claims and Emotional Distress

Losing a loved one in an accident or other tragedy can be incredibly painful. In some cases, the surviving family members may be able to seek damages for their emotional distress. North Carolina recognizes compensation for "negligent infliction of severe emotional distress," but these cases are quite difficult. In order to prevail, you must be able to prove the following:

1. You suffered severe emotional distress beyond a normal level of sadness, fear, or disappointment; and
2. Your emotional distress was a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the other party's negligent or intentional actions.

If you have suffered from chronic depression, anxiety, psychosis, or some similar affliction as a result of the accident, you may be entitled to compensation for emotional distress. You may need to get a medical diagnosis in order to document your claim. Unfortunately, there are no clear guidelines as to when you can and cannot pursue a claim for emotional distress - it will depend on the facts and circumstances specific to your case. An experienced wrongful death attorney can evaluate your claim and determine whether you can seek damages for infliction of emotional distress.
